Many cat owners will agree that transporting a feline can be stressful. The majority of cats get nervous, fidgety, and sometimes very violent. If you're lucky, the cat will sleep through the entire trip and save you a lot of anxiety. Unfortunately, this rarely happens. But the best cat carrier can make all the difference.

A cat carrier determines how happy and comfortable your fur baby is — so it's essential to take the time to find the right one. Of course, the right carrier will depend on the type of cat you have.

Choose the Best Cat Carrier for Your Furry Friend

A cat doesn't need to ride in a carrier very often. You'll only need a pet bag for the occasional vet visit, when you're moving, while traveling, and in emergencies.

Nonetheless, you need to invest in the best cat carrier to ensure your pet's safety and comfort. Unfortunately, finding the best cat carrier isn't a walk in the park. There are so many options to choose from, which makes it challenging to narrow down to the best.

But if you know what to look for, finding a high-quality carrier for your cat should be a breeze.

Size is everything

Your first instinct may be to go for the most spacious cat carrier you can find. After all, if the cat has a lot of room to move around, they'll be more comfortable, right? Wrong.

When selecting a cat carrier, a snug fit is better because cats tend to feel safer in small spaces — the reason why you'll see them hiding behind sofas and in narrow spaces.

A general rule of thumb is to choose a cat carrier that's 1.5 times bigger than your cat. For kittens, you still need to get an adult-sized carrier because they'll need it when they reach adulthood. However, you may have to fill the extra spaces with blankets to prevent your kitten from sliding in all directions when you're transporting him.

Consider the material

The material of the pet carrier is also a crucial consideration since it determines how comfortable your pet is and eases your transportation.

However, there are different materials for different types of cats. For instance, nylon carriers are perfect for calm cats since you don't have to worry about your furry friend trying to scratch their way out.

Plastic pet carriers, on the other hand, are perfect for anxious cats. These types of carriers are sturdier and will withstand scratching and thrashing. Besides, they're quite durable.

Therefore, take some time to explore the options available and select the right one for your cat.

The most crucial factor to consider

The last thing you want is for your cat to overheat and suffocate in their carrier, which can quickly happen on a long-distance trip. To ensure this doesn't happen, choose a well-ventilated pet carrier.

Your pet's safety is key

Another crucial consideration is security. You need to ensure your cat won't be able to escape from the carrier. Also, make sure there are no protrusions on the bag that can injure your cat.

Furthermore, you need to look for a carrier with seatbelt loops if you're planning to have the carrier in your car. This way, the bag won't move out of place in transit.

Consider ease of access

Buying a pet carrier that's easy to open and close will save you a lot of hassle — especially if you have a reluctant cat. It's best to go for a pet carrier that either opens from the top or has a removable cover.

Such cat carriers are beneficial because they make it easy to get the cat out. Not to mention, the vet can examine your furry friend without having to take them out of the carrier, which is more comfortable for the cat.
